

I and many like me support the elimination of element 1, or at least the modification of element 1. There is a place for CW but getting the CW permit should exist on it's own right, not tied to the useage of all the other frequencies below 30mhz. Make the Morse Code proficiency test something on it's own and open the General Class privileges to all that can pass the General Class theory exam. I think you will find that most that support keeping the code are the ones that have already passed the test. Ham radio is dieing a slow death and changes to the requirements for testing by elimination of this dated requirement will help put life back into the HAM ranks.